For years, the failing news magazine U.S. News has sold the American public the idea that colleges and universities can be ranked from #1 into the hundreds. That this is utter nonsense is apparent to anyone who actually thinks about it a little. That most people don't really seem to have thought much about it at all is a shame. It means they are buying into what is essentially a sham. Why don't we rank the best foods? The best cities? The best cars? The best shoes? Our response to such silliness (and ranking lists are an American favorite), has to be "according to who? By what criteria?"

We ought to do this with the U.S. News colleges lists, too, of course but most people don't seem to. They seem to believe that some unnamed experts have figured all this out, that there are some schools which are just much better,. They actually believe that Amherst or Williams "is" somehow the best liberal arts college in the country. Or that Harvard, Yale or Princeton are the best large universities. All are very fine schools but so are Michigan, Cal Tech, Bowdoin, Colgate, Reed, and the University of Texas. It depends on what you want to get out of college. Williams and Yale are not good colleges for many students. In fact, they are positively the wrong colleges for many students if they operate in ways that students would find unhelpful, if their academic program is too rigid or inappropriate for a student's interest, or if the student body is unappealing or the location is inappropriate -- or dozens of other factors U.S. News simply has nothing to say about. So U.S. News rankings attempt to generalize in ways that are not relevant to many students' needs. This is bad enough, but they also use misleading data.
