Synopsis

Sublimation is about the career and murder of a young research scientist shortly after his return from Pakistan as a consultant for the United Nation. The book provides insight into the contract research segment of scientific research and development. Because government funding plays such an important role, government policy and politics have an impact on research. This fact is part of background leading to the fictional murder.

Customer Reviews

Five stars for this one. Suspense filled, technically a delight and a "can't put down the book" mystery. Much better than some of the mass production writing by better known novelists. Recommended for readers who want some thoughtful depth as well as entertainment. A journey into the world of research and national secrecy about unknown projects sponsored by the government and the complicity of academia.

This book is a thinly-veiled autobiography. The author explains how good R&D is done and what (good and bad) consequences result. His revelations concerning the "Institute" are right on target for the time frame of the novel. Some one should write a similar book that updates that information. His view of the developments and US activities in Chile is thought-provoking. So is the murder mystery!The author provides details of his technical triumphs. They are presented as answers to the journalist's questions. As a chemist/engineer, I thought that this was wonderful. I learned a lot! A person without technical training may get lost. The other aspects of the book are sufficient make it a worthwhile read.
